The Many-Fiddlers Annual Berkeley Folk Festival, held at Berkeley's Hemlock Park, was a distinct event in the history of folk music in the Berkeley area. The festival was a sort of folk music marathon, with three days of non-stop fiddling and singing. It was a remarkable event, and a fitting end to the folk music craze that had been building in the Bay Area for several years.

FIDDLIN' IN BERKELEY

The festival began with a contest, where fiddlers from all over the Bay Area came to compete. The fiddlers were judged on their technique, as well as their ability to entertain the audience. The contest was a huge success, and drew a large crowd of spectators.

One of the fiddlers who stood out was a young man named Bob Dylan. Dylan had been playing the fiddle for a few years, and had quickly made a name for himself in the folk music scene. His playing was impressive, and he was able to captivate the audience with his music.

The festival also featured a variety of other events, including workshops and concerts. The workshops were open to anyone who wanted to learn more about folk music, and were taught by some of the most talented fiddlers in the area. The concerts were a chance for the fiddlers to showcase their skills to a wider audience.

The festival was a huge success, and it helped to popularize folk music in the Berkeley area. It was a fitting end to a period of cultural change, and it helped to set the stage for the counterculture movement that was to come in the 1960s.
